

Dear Roble Gamers,

As you may have heard, Polly Merace, the CEO of NanoPHarm and recent Roble resident, recently disappeared without a trace.

NanoPHarm public relations claims that she's on sabbatical, but we don't buy it. Finding her will be vital to unveiling this mystery. But it won't be easy. Like all the brilliant people at NanoPHarm, she's good at covering her tracks through pseudonyms. Maybe you can help.

I've done some research on Merace's brief time at Stanford last fall.

This what I've found:

- She visited Roble on freshman arrival day – probably to scout for recruits – and was so enamored with the Beatles music playing that she set up a lawn chair in the parking lot to look up at Roble and listen.
- She received her key for a room in the Penthouse (below 1A). She was never seen there with much baggage besides several computers, but she did find the time to wander the halls of Roble.
- She stopped out of Stanford on the first day of fall quarter classes, deciding to focus her full attention on NanoPHarm research and development.
- She left a computer hidden somewhere in Roble (probably in a supply closet or something) running iTunes, perhaps as a memento, with the library's password set to "cantseeme".

Good luck!

-Dr. Anderson